

Vladimir Tarnopolski—An Interview

Between September 28 and October 1, the University of Iowa hosted the Russian Contemporary Music Festival (see the November 5th issue of the New York Times for a review written by Richard Taruskin). This is an interview between Vladimir Tarnopolski and David Gompper that took place (in a maxi-van driving to Chicago) on October 2, 2000, and was translated by Marina Frolova-Walker. Following, on page 11, is a short interview with Roman Ledeniov.

DKG: Discuss contemporary music and how it functions at the Moscow Conservatory of Music.

VT: Seven years ago a special center for contemporary music was founded at the Moscow Conservatory. The reason for that was so that our students had the chance to learn about the most modern trends. We are collecting as much information as possible on modern music—booklets, work lists, and most importantly, scores and recordings.

DKG: How do you seek out these recordings and find the composers? How do you decide what to perform?

VT: Our library is so poor that we still need the traditional 20th-century scores—Berio, Stockhausen, and Ligeti. They are simply not there. We are first trying to obtain the classics of modern music. As part of this center, a new music ensemble was formed called Studio New Music. This ensemble was originally founded as a special post-graduate class for performers. Now it is much more than that, not just part of an educational system—its role is much bigger. We give over ten different concert programs a year. The ensemble is made up of not only post-graduate students but musicians who have graduated.

The most important performing repertoire for us is music from the Russian avant-garde (music from the 1920s)—many of these works have been revised and are now enjoying their second premieres. Secondly, our repertoire includes both the classics of Europe and of our own avant-garde: Gubaidulina, Schnittke, Denisov, etc. Finally, the most important part of our work is performing compositions by our young composers. We also organize concerts that are devoted to one composer, dedicated exclusively to their work. At present we are trying to organize competitions for young composers. The last one was in December 1999, with a sponsorship by SONY. And we found a whole number of new, very interesting young composers.

But the main part of our activities is centered around the festival of music called Moscow Forum. Seven have already been organized, and each of them has had a theme with one particular country: Holland, England, Germany, Italy, Austria (two times),

National Conference — An Update

A total of 333 scores were submitted by 150 composers for performance at the 35th National Conference, held in Syracuse, New York and hosted by the Society of New Music, Neva Pilgrim, director. The web site has been successful for informing composers and performers of the current status of their scores—where each score was sent and what ensemble chose which works for performance. At the time of press, some 198 scores were distributed.

The registration fee for all events has been set at $65, with Saturday's all-day fee at $20 and a per-concert fee of $10. There will be receptions after the Thursday and Friday night concerts, plus a banquet before the Saturday evening concert.

Hotel Information: Genesee Inn, 1060 East Genesee St., Syracuse, N.Y. 13210, Phone: 800-365-4663. Ask for block of rooms (30) under "Society of Composers". Cut off date is 1 March 2001. Rate is $59/night for one queen-size bed, $79 for 2 double beds.

Radisson Plaza, The Hotel Syracuse, 500 South Warren Street, Syracuse, N.Y. 13202; Phone: 800-333-3333 or 315-422-5121. Ask for block for rooms (20) under "Society of Composers". Cut off date is 28 February 2001. Rate is $95 for either single or double. Transportation to and from airport or train station on an individual basis.

SCI/ASCAP Student Competition—An Update

A total of 88 students submitted scores for adjudication in this year's commissioning competition. The scores will be sent out to two evaluators in each of the nine regions, and three regional winners will be selected. For the second adjudication round, up to twenty-four scores will be evaluated and will take place at the Student National Conference at Indiana University March 1-3. The winners will be announced at the banquet.

I am pleased to announce that the winners of last year's competition will have their works premiered at the Student National conference: first place winner Lansing D. McLoskey, with a work for chorus, to be performed on Saturday, March 3rd at 4:00 p.m.; second place winner Karim Al-Zand, with a work for wind ensemble, slated for Thursday, March 1st at 8:00 p.m.; and third place winner Ching-chu Hu, with a work for the New Music Ensemble, which will be premiered on Friday, March 2nd at 8:00 p.m. I look forward to this exciting conference, hosted by Jason Bahr. Heads up—we are looking for a school to host next year's student conference!

and France. For instance, the Austrian festival focused on music of the period of the dismantling of the empire at the beginning of the century in Austria and the end of the century in Russia. Another theme was Freedom or Engagement, which was the Dutch-Russian festival. With every festival we invite an ensemble from that country. Our festival attracts the leading ensembles from the guest countries such as Ensemble Modern from Germany, Klangforum Wien from Austria, etc. During these festivals we also hold master classes and a musicological conference. Also, we have separate days of contemporary music outside these festivals and themes. We have attempted to hold an American festival, but we found that America was the poorest country—we couldn't find any organization in America to sponsor American musicians to participate.

DKG: That's because such support doesn't exist in this country.

VT: It is very strange, because each European country has some organization responsible for assisting musicians in this regard. We tried to put together a festival with the help of Joel Feigen (UCSB). He very kindly recommended two agents from New York, but they couldn't raise the money. So the two most difficult countries for modern music is Russia and America. For the past seven years we have not received any financial support for these festivals from any entity within Russia. And I understand it is similar to a certain degree here in America. Some years ago I also spoke to the American cultural attaché in Moscow. It seems our bureaucrats are also very similar to each other. But I still dream to hold an American festival.

DKG: What is your approach to composition, and do you consider yourself a Russian composer?

VT: First of all the composer must work on two levels. The first level is one of beauty and sensuousness—the sensation of the material itself. At this level, the composer must be a hypersensitive yet mentally ill person. But one must understand that everything has been done, that every combination has been tried. And yet the composer still exists. The artist must continue to search for something new, like finding a new perfume. At the same time he or she must work at a different level, in an opposite direction. They must be a philosopher. They must be above the petty things of life. Wise, in terms of form, divorced of sentimentalism, to have a birds-eye view of the world, to see how the world is constructed. And between these two novels the composers must oscillate. If you look at Beethoven's sketches, you will see that this is the way he worked. He always had an idea of the entire construction. And he was tormenting himself by searching for material, only to realize that the material didn't match the construction. So he changed the construction, the approach. Gradually, the amplitude (or the shifting back and forth) becomes smaller and smaller, at which time you end up with a composition.

I am not ethnically Russian, and while I belong to the Russian culture, maybe I have a slightly different temperament than the Russian people, more southern. Originally I come from the Ukraine, of Jewish origin. There have been Jewish settlements in the Ukraine for centuries, and it is considered a different culture. But in short, I would say that I am a Russian composer. What it doesn't mean is thus: I think there are composers in Russia who think of themselves as merely ethnic composers. They still think in terms of 19th century ideas in trying to solve problems that are not topical anymore. Everyone has forgotten these problems in the West, for example, of nationalism in music. I still maintain it is a 19th century problem—the Polish school, the Czech school, the Norwegian school, etc. For me, the “national” in cultural terms manifests itself somewhere else, in the feeling of space and time. Some of my colleagues look for the national in the wrong place, in the quotation of stylization of folk music. I don't believe such approaches can't be grounds for the composer's idea, but to say, “I compose folk music” is a bit naive.

As you know, our festival Moscow Forum next April has the following theme—The Avant-garde at the Crossroads of the Ethnic and Technique: Technology and Ethnicism, and will attempt to show the use of folkloric elements within the broader context of technique and technology. To date, in this time of increasing globalization, the naive quasi-folk is interesting only to tourists—yes, they are completely Russian, but I see them as foreigners.

It is like matryokhas [the colorfully-painted dolls or objects (eggs, bowls, etc.) made of wood]. No Russian would ever purchase these dolls for themselves, but only for foreigners as presents. A composer who uses folk music, for instance in this naive way, is a foreigner in my view. Unfortunately, they think themselves as true Russians—this is a painful and serious problem for us.

I think there are much deeper things that define whether one belongs to this or that culture. When you have a country with a special history that has never had democracy, all those social ideals have tended to be expressed in art. In your country, those ideals have been expressed in science, in religious or social orders, in individual careers and in other organizational forms. For us, art is much more important than it seems for those living in the West. It is one of the most important aspects of our life. It can be both religion and philosophy for us.

For example, in England, you can compliment a composer by saying, “that was a lovely piece.” Such a statement would be very offensive said to a Russian composer. Art has a very special function in the structure of Russian social life, for it was the only thing that was opposed to the official way of life, which is why most of the Russians have this special sense of time.

A true story, probably Swiss. A writer is taking a train, and decides to write a real Russian novel. He takes out his pen, his paper...the train takes off. He looks out the window and starts to write the first phrase. And at this very moment, the train reaches the end of Switzerland. He has no physical possibility to write a real Russian novel because of the small size of the country. In Russia, on the other hand, we have this limitless space, history, and time.

If we compare Russian music with the music of Europe, Germany or Austria, we shine quite a lot, with which I am always in dialogue or argument over this. But this

Herbert Brün—A Rememberance

Texts for a Festival of Compositions
Celebrating Herbert Brün's
80th Birthday Year

My Beginning Brün

Most memorable was my time as Herbert's student. The journey began with "The Monadology" of Gottfried Leibnitz. The scenario, repeated almost weekly for 2 years, always placed me in a comfortable brown barrel chair facing Herbert with a fresh pack of cigarettes between us on a coffee table. The task: to learn to know the proper considerations for useful acts of composition in one's time—in spite of the contrempts of society—without misplaced hankerings for the past. Mechanics were left for official channels, nor was pleasant musical chit chat ever permitted.

My reward: aesthetic life itself.

In the late 1960s, I studied with composer Herbert Brün who cautioned me against making music a competitive activity. He taught my ensemble to play Schoenberg's "Wind Quintet". We rehearsed, not with the goal of public performance, but to explore the piece. Insisting on a clear performance of each phrase, he let the music become our teacher. He urged us to create long phrases by just playing each note like building sentences by saying each word. When our concentration would falter, he would show where we neglected individual notes. He led us away from the cults of cerebral inquiry and concert-driven preparation. He simplified performance.

Often,
when showing someone something,
I notice traces left
of what I was shown (by Herbert):
traces of a thought,
a formulation,
a performance.

Some don't teach; some do.
Some teach, but not teaching.

Some teach,
and teach teaching too.

He did; he does:
Teach me,
teach the language,
teach composition
and society, something new
to want,
to see,
to understand,
to hear,

to say,
to do.

I share with Herbert a similar narrative. At one point in our lives we had to flee Europe (because the deathtrap it had become for Jews) to Israel. And then some years later we landed in this country yearning to become insiders in a hospitable (intellectual and artistic) milieu. Indeed, we did find here great friendships and they are our daily sustenance. Reluctantly or gladly (whatever may be our case) we the "foreign" outsiders joined the "native" outsiders hoping to become someday insiders in a hospitable (intellectual and artistic) milieu.

Here is my small thought for Herbert:

Precision driven beyond the boundary of extremity—of perversity, even—to the place where it transmutes into transcendent insight: So, often, has Herbert Brün, in words and sounds and algorithmic imagery, opened and reopened my rational senses by turning their gaze inside out. (In words, "Against Plausibility"; in sounds, "Futility"; in graphics, "Mutatis Mutandis", and much elsewhere.) Driving rationality beyond the arcane, behind the banal, to the place where it looks, with astonishment, but without pity, upon its own self-delusion ... on the very tongue in which it pronounces its own name ... and reconstructs a possible world which, possibly, could be habitable ...

Herbert Brün is one of the most relevant and important musicians in the Western World.

Stuart Saunders Smith

Most artists are diverted from their creative ends by the pressures of the art world, by fads and fashions, by what critics think of as "hot" at any particular time. One of Herbert Brün's most special qualities has been his indefatigable exploration of the implications of the new technologies with which he's worked, wherever that exploration may have led him. Even more important, Herbert has made us aware that those explorations might help us to open up new possibilities for enjoying the world, especially when they do not conform to conventional tastes and understandings. As Herbert put it to me on a few occasions, "Music that you do not yet like." He meant that what's really important is that we open up to what's new and interesting in the world. It's a wonderful message and I've always loved him for it.

Joel Chadabe

Having arrived in Champaign-Urbana in 1974, I remember coming out of my first class taught by Professor Brün with my being somewhat dazed, confused and saying to myself "well Toto, we're not in Kansas anymore!" For some reason I decided to give these encounters, and myself, several more chances to attempt to ascertain their meaning and purpose.

Perhaps it was the unusualness of the class and the unusualness of the teacher that finally peaked my interest, patience and inner strength to begin to question that which I had not previously considered or understood. I was struck by not only Professor Brün's unique language constructions, observations, criticisms and often provocative tactics, but also his enticing and genuine "dear Dad" qualities that guided me through the moments of conflict and discovery. Initially, the investigations of definitions, distinctions, intent, the unintended and critical discourse were at times uncomfortable, yet I believe these awakenings became the spark that maintains much of the energy in our lives today.

For many of us, Professor Brün's discourse was a language not yet experienced and understood. Composition of an idea, text, context and/or conditions with, not only full awareness of intent, but also with an awareness and avoidance of that which is not intended, and to construct systems wherein deliberately stipulated premises and statements of desires, become true—became a non-trivial language found—with much yet to be experienced and understood.

These encounters, continuing questions and constructs, and for me, our ensuing wonderful collaborations over many years both in and out of the Studio, remain fresh to this day.

"A Mere Ripple"? ... No! You are much, much more. Thank you for the consequences I have experienced through your being my teacher, my colleague and my friend!

Scott Wyatt
Urbana, Illinois
2 March 1998

January, 1974: Herbert in his small studio at the School of Music, biting his pipe, while a computer science student with a scraggly beard and long brown hair argues with him: a professor of music, debating cognition with a scientist. Herbert's eyes, behind his small, brown glasses, are alert, thinking, and noticing everything. The room is cramped: there is just enough room for a desk, two chairs, and an upright piano.

Cold, grey, late-afternoon winter's light comes though a tall, narrow window, looking out over the roof of a restaurant. There is a small clipping from a newspaper, hung on the wall next to his desk, of eight men in military uniform, standing in line. "That," Herbert says to the student, pointing to the clipping with the stem of his pipe, "gives me nightmares!"

This was my first meeting with Herbert. I had come to ask permission to take his freshman music composition class. He allowed it; I stayed 24 years.

Herbert, someone without diplomas, knows the difference between getting a degree and getting an education. He demands that his students know what they are talking about: that they use the language they speak, rather than be used by it.

For this he earns the wrath of many musicians, artists, and composers—and even some of his students, who fail to see that he offers a way of maintaining friendships instead of the husk of linguistic usage. Nor does he allow sentimentality to intrude, or its converse, cynicism.

His musical knowledge ranges from the 18th, 19th, and 20th century piano literature (for which he trained as a concert pianist), to the jazz composers of the 1930s and 40s (he worked for 20 years as a nightclub pianist), to the compositional experiments of the 1950s and 60s (he was one of the first composers to work in the Cologne electronic studios), and up to the present. However, he does not let his knowledge of what has been the case become a standard for what is not yet the case: He teaches the past so that his students learn what they no longer have to do.

His enthusiasm for music, theater, and art infects his students. He attracts them due to his knowledge of the arts, the clarity with which expresses it, their current social function, and their potential.

Though patient with ignorance and naivete, he has no tolerance for strutting scholarship, pedagogy, social climbing, or hypocrisy, whether it comes disguised as a potential student or a pretentious colleague. The fury he unleashes on present conditions and linguistic usage mirrors the passion and intensity with which he stakes his hope on a potential future.

For all this, and for much more, his students love him.

Arun Chandra
Olympia, Washington
October, 1998

The texts were originally collected by Arun Chandra and translated from German into English by Marianne Brün. Many thanks to Mark Sullivan who contacted each person for permission to have their tribute reprinted.

Herbert Brün was born in Berlin, Germany in 1918. A German composer residing in the USA since 1963, he left Germany in 1936 for Palestine, where he studied piano and composition at the Jerusalem Conservatory and then with Stefan Wolpe, Eli Friedman, and Frank Pelleg. He furthered his studies at Tanglewood and Columbia University (1948-50).

From 1955-61, in addition to composing, he conducted research concerning electro-acoustics with regard to possibilities for musical composition in Paris, Cologne, and Munich. During this period he also worked as composer and conductor of music for the theater, gave lectures and seminars emphasizing the function of music in society, and did a series of broadcasts on contemporary music. After a lecture tour of the U.S. in 1962, Brün was invited by Lejaren Hiller to join the faculty of the University of Illinois. There Brün continued his work in the electronic studio and began research on composition with computers, which resulted in pieces for tape and instruments, tape alone, and graphics some to be performed by interpreters.

Throughout the 1970s, 80s, and mid 90s, while remaining on the University of Illinois faculty (Professor Emeritus 1987), Brün held residencies and guest professorships around the world. Since 1980, he has also toured and taught with the Performer's Workshop Ensemble, a group he founded. His awards and honors include an honorary doctorate from the University of Frankfurt, one prize from the International Society of Bassists, (1977), and the Norbert Wiener medal from the American Society for Cybernetics (1993).•

SOCIETY OF COMPOSERS, INC. CD SERIES

Deadline: February 1 (postmark)

The Society of Composers, Inc., invites composers to submit one work to be considered for inclusion on their next CD. The series is released by Capstone Records and is distributed by Albany Music Distributors. Works may be for any instruments including voice, tape, and electronics, and of any duration. If selected, each composer must provide a professional-quality studio DAT recording of the work and pay a composer's fee of $85/minute to cover production costs. All entrants must be (or become) full members of SCI to be considered. In addition to being eligible to submit works for this project, members receive the monthly SCI Newsletter, monthly transmission of SCION (SCI Online News), and are eligible to submit works to Regional and National Conferences for performances. Postmark deadline: February 1. Submit anonymous score and recording, SASE, $50 one-year membership dues (if not already a member), and an envelope containing composer name and contact information, title, instrumentation, and duration to: William Ryan, Submissions Coordinator, Society of Composers Incorporated, 170 West 74th Street, New York, NY 10023.

SOCIETY OF COMPOSERS, INC. JOURNAL OF MUSIC SCORES

Deadline: February 1 (postmark)

The Society of Composers, Inc., invites composers to submit one work to be considered for inclusion in the next Journal of Music Scores. The Journal is an anthology of music by members of the Society and is published by European American Music. Submissions may be for any instruments including voice, but should be of relatively short to medium length since the volumes generally contain 3 to 5 pieces and are approximately 100 pages. Scores should be exceptionally clear and reducible to 8-1/2 by 11 inches. If selected, each composer must provide the editor with camera-ready copy. The Journal is used for reference only. A notice about the availability of performance material is included. The composer retains the copyright of the music and royalties are not paid by either SCI or European American Music. Although most of the pieces in the Journal are unpublished, we have occasionally reprinted pieces that are commercially published. If this is the case, the composer must submit a letter of permission from the publisher with the submission and make it clear that royalties or reprint fees are not paid. All entrants must be (or become) full members of SCI to be considered. In addition to being eligible to submit works for this project, members receive the monthly SCI Newsletter, monthly transmission of SCION (SCI Online News), and are eligible to submit works to Regional and National Conferences for performances. Postmark deadline: Feb. 1. Submit anonymous score and recording, SASE, $50 one-year membership dues (if not already a member), and an envelope containing composer name and contact information, title, instrumentation, and duration to: William Ryan, Submissions Coordinator, Society of Composers Incorporated, 170 West 74th Street, New York, NY 10023.

ALERT!

If you teach in a department or school of music, please ensure that concert programs presented by your university are being collected and sent to ASCAP and BMI each on a regular basis. Each agency, which relies on these programs, extracts performance information and determines the amount of royalty credited to each composer based on a sample rate.

European music, in its logic and gestures reminds me of the following. It is as if I came into a beautiful supermarket where there are many items for sale. They are not connected to each other, but I can buy lots of unconnected things. From these materials I can create my own composition, as if I were working with those colorful building blocks for children known as Legos. I think many Russian composers are opposed to this way of working because they acknowledge a different sense of a continuum, and try instead to find some unity in everything. As a result they understand music with a special sense of time and space.

For instance, the typical idea of credit for the West is when a person borrows something from the future. He wants to have everything at the same time, everything now, a piece of the future right now. It is great for economics, but I am not sure it is good for art. In Russia, just the opposite occurs. We tend to look into the past, to what happened in our history. A "new means" is not an end in itself but rather the confirmation of an old truth. We ask where mistakes were made—was it after the revolution? We are endlessly digging up our own history. That is why the category of the past, in quotations or poly-stylistic elements is so important for us. In my opinion, our minimalism often has different roots than in the West.

DKG: What are the roots of Russian minimalism?

VT: The causes can be found in Russian Nihilism, like Turgenev's Fathers and Sons. There for the first time we can see the psychology of negation of everything. I also think Russian minimalists suffer a great inferiority complex, because they think they lag behind the West and have no hope of catching up. The Russian minimalism appeared in the time of the empty counters of the Soviet regime, and in this sense it reflects exactly its epoch, the 1970s and 80s in the USSR. Fortunately, there is an entirely new epoch in Russia today.*

Vladimir Tarnopolski (b. 1955) was born in Dnepropetrovsk and studied composition at the Moscow Tchaikovsky Conservatory with Nikolai Sidelnikov and Edison Denisov, and music theory with Yuri Chulopov. Tarnopolski is a frequently seen as a guest at many western festivals of contemporary music.

Tarnopolski was one of the initiators of ACM, the Association for Contemporary Music in Moscow (1989), a group of composers who reacted against the official Soviet cultural philosophy (the so-called socialist-realism). In 1992 he became a professor of composition at the Tchaikovsky Conservatory. In 1993 he organized the ISCM in Moscow and was one of the founders of the ensemble Studio New Music which performed many premieres including the works of the Russian avant-garde from the last 90 years. Since 1994 Tarnopolski has organized the new annual International Festival of Contemporary Music in Moscow, Moscow Forum, the main idea which is to integrate contemporary Russian and East-European music with Western music.*

Roman Ledeniov— a brief interview

DKG: Can one "teach" composition?

RL: One can learn, but one can't teach it. You can teach a talented person to compose, and here the advice of the teacher would be useful. But if the person is not talented, you can only teach them to imitate. As everywhere, we have lots of non-talented composers who write music.

We all learn from the music that has already been written, from the composers who have already left their trace in history. A composition teacher can play the role as a mediator between the music that has already been written and the young composer who doesn't know much yet. The teacher should find the kernel of the talent of the composer (of which the composer may not be aware) and basically push him or her in the right direction.

The process of education in a composition class is based on the works that the young composer is writing...it is important that the teacher would comment and point out various things, and make criticisms and that the young composer would listen. The role of a composition teacher is a responsible one.

Lutoslawski was once asked why he doesn't teach. He said two things: "I don't know enough", realizing the responsibility of the teacher. And the second thing he said was that there were not enough talented people around and he didn't want to waste his time. With age, I find that the technical aspects, even the most tempting of them is less important. It is most important that music be most expressive, filled with feeling.*
